Histone modifications play an important role in epigenetic regulation of gene expression. Many modifications of histone proteins such as methylation, acetylation and phosphorylation are reversible and dynamic. Methylation on the ϵ -amino group of lysine residues in histone tails and N-termini of histone H3 and H4 can be dynamically regulated by histone methyltransferases and demethylases. Interestingly, the methylation state of histones is rather dynamic. It is expected that histone methylation is a pivotal regulatory mechanism for various complex biological processes including carcinogenesis and cancer progression. Since the number of lysine residues increases from histone H3 to H4, the number of putative methylation sites in the histones increases accordingly. Therefore, quantitative analysis of lysine methylation in a region-selective manner is needed to understand the molecular mechanism of DNA transactions. Here, we describe a sample preparation protocol of methylated histones using Spodogen, a novel chemical derivatization reagent, for sensitive detection by Fourier transform mass spectrometry (FTMS). It is possible to analyze partially methylated histones with less than 1% of the site modification. Furthermore, this method provides a sensitive and highly selective quantitation of an individual methylation site in the presence e24f408de9
