German measles induced by a vaccine containing attenuated measles virus containing the 1918 influenza virus H1N1 hemagglutinin antigen. A 4-year-old girl who had not received measles immunization was admitted to our hospital because of fever, cough, and vomiting. Although the etiologic diagnosis was made as measles, her hematologic findings showed thrombocytopenia, a high serum CRP level, and a high white blood cell count. Retrospective testing for antibodies against the hemagglutinin antigen of a Japanese isolate of the 1918 influenza virus indicated a previous history of immunization against measles with an attenuated live vaccine containing the hemagglutinin antigen of the 1918 influenza virus. The patient was eventually diagnosed as having German measles because of the presence of a rash. The results of this case report and a recent review of the literature revealed that the vaccine containing the 1918 influenza virus H1N1 hemagglutinin antigen has been associated with atypical measles infection, similar to our patient. These findings indicate that in Japan and possibly in other parts of the world, careful epidemiologic investigations should be conducted for the possibility of atypical measles infection to identify the source of the infection.

Antioxidant therapy for stroke prevention and treatment. Oxidative stress is a fundamental mechanism of tissue damage in stroke. The deleterious effects of oxidative stress can be limited by antioxidants, which prevent reactive oxygen species (ROS)-mediated damage to brain tissue. Preventing or treating oxidative stress in the setting of stroke may limit the severity of stroke damage as well as the incidence and progression of vascular cognitive impairment. This article reviews the available evidence regarding the potential benefits of antioxidant therapy following stroke. The role of antioxidants in the treatment of clinical stroke is warranted.
